

Based on the origin story of Jackson, this is a literary response by LS, 18, from Youth Infinity (a service by AMKFSC Community Services)

Once upon a time, there was a boy called Jackson. He was living in a kingdom called Puppet Kingdom. Puppet Kingdom was ruled by a King named Nosey. His nose would grow by an inch every time he lied and made fake promises to the people of the kingdom. His people did not like him at all. Many were living in poverty. He was a self-centered King.

Young Jackson had deep frustration and anger towards the King. His goal was to be the King and give the people what they want. He wanted to make the Puppet Kingdom a better place but he knew that to get there would be a difficult task.

As he grew older, he started with small things that steered the people's heart. He helped elderlies and solved personal problems for the people. This made him famous among the people of puppet Kingdom. They knew if they needed help, they can confront Jackson. This made him famous among the people and he grew his own image.

He also started to give speeches in front of markets and places where there are a lot of people. He said to his people that he would give them the things that they needed and would end poverty in the Kingdom and also promised that everyone will not suffer from starvation. This made him the people's king but he was yet to take over the position of the King.

One day, he went to the King's Palace and told the guards that he wanted to speak to the King. Even though the guards were on Jackson's side, they had no choice but to work for the King to feed their families.

At this point of time, the King had already known who Jackson was and what he was doing. The King was afraid one day Jackson would take over him.

Jackson went into the palace and met the King. This was his ambition from young and he couldn't believe it. This was his only chance. He told the king that's he's not worthy and that the people should decide who the King was. The King decided on his idea.

They went up to the balcony where the people of the kingdom were shouting Jackson's name from below. They were booing Nosey and supporting Jackson loudly. This made the King feel embarrassed. He went out to the balcony and sat down. He told Jackson he was never ashamed like this ever in his life. He was very remorseful and told Jackson that he must be the rightful King and give the people what they want.

Jackson was very touched by what the King said. The King took off his crown and gave it to Jackson. From that day, Jackson was named King.
